

Disclaimer

Climbing and mountaineering in any form or setting are inherently hazardous and dangerous activities that may result in injury or death. Activities associated with climbing and mountaineering, including, but not limited to, rappelling, scrambling, bouldering, hiking, and just watching, also expose people to risks that can result in injury or death. This text is not a substitute for a complete course of formal instruction. No person should rely only on this text or similar material to prepare him or her for climbing and its associated activities. The Arizona Mountaineering Club makes no warranty, either express or implied, that this text is accurate, complete or reliable, or that the information has been updated to reflect current standard industry practice. The information contained in this publication is subject to change without notice.

The techniques described in the following documents do not guarantee a safe climbing experience. It is recommended that all of the techniques in this text be practiced and learned thoroughly before attempting to use them in actual climbing situations. Even if these techniques are used properly, there is still a chance of injury or death, depending on many factors. The safety of climbers, regardless of the techniques used, always depends on the situation, the care and skill of each individual involved, and factors beyond the control of any participant.

Formal instruction, in any form or setting, no matter how complete, can only be an introduction to climbing and its associated activities. The safety of climbers, regardless of the form or setting, even after completion of a course of formal instruction, always depends on the situation, the care and skill of each individual involved, and factors beyond the control of any participant. There is always a risk of injury or death inherent in climbing and its associated activities.
